

Workday Update

UNO staff members named Workday facilitators

As the University of New Orleans, Louisiana Tech University, and Southeastern Louisiana University prepare for the transition to Workday, the three systems have been coordinating a massive restructuring of business and operating procedures. The collaborative effort demands dedicated oversight, and the University of Louisiana System has named facilitators at each university to champion the integration of crucial component systems.

Carol Lunn, assistant vice president for research and economic development, and David Armstrong, payroll manager, were named the system-wide facilitators for the grants and payroll components of Workday.

Lunn, Armstrong, and their staffs are working with their counterparts at Louisiana Tech and Southeastern to ensure Workday supports business procedures vital to all three universities. They host regular meetings with their respective teams and phone calls with the Workday consultant, facilitating conversation and advocating for the groups' priorities.

In May, Lunn and the UNO Office of Research will host a system-wide demonstration of Workday's grant administration and management functionality, providing documentation to support user training at all three universities.
